On the morning the sea disappeared, Mara woke to bells ringing beneath the earth. She stepped outside her cottage and found the harbor empty, gone to the horizon. Fishing boats rested crookedly on black mud, the lighthouse stood over a plain of glistening sand. The villagers gathered along the cliff, Mara stared at a stone road that had risen from the seabed, stretching toward a dark shape miles away. Her grandfather had told her that an island slept beneath the waves and surfaced only when the moon forgot its name. Anyone who reached it could ask one question and receive a true answer, though truth, he warned, was rarely kind. Mara had spent seven years wondering why her brother Tomas had sailed into a clear afternoon and never returned. Quickly, she packed bread, water, a lantern, and Tomas's brass compass, then climbed down and stepped onto the road. The stones were cold and dry. Behind her, the villagers shouted, but their voices faded as she walked farther from shore. Around her lay the secret floor of the sea: red coral, shattered anchors, statues covered in shells. She passed a crown tangled in weeds and a cannon pointed skyward. The compass needle spun until she whispered Tomas's name. Then it steadied, pointing forward. By noon, the road entered a valley formed by two walls of water. Fish swam beside her at eye level, gliding through blue silence. A whale moved beyond them like a drifting mountain. Once, she heard footsteps behind her, but when she turned, the road was empty. Later, she heard Tomas calling from within the water. "Mara," it pleaded, "come here." She nearly stepped from the road, but remembered her grandfather's warning: the sea imitates what you love before it takes you. She covered her ears and continued until the voice became laughter. Near sunset, she reached the island. It rose from the seabed like a broken tooth, crowned by a tower made of green stone. The door opened before she touched it. Inside, a spiral staircase descended. Mara lit her lantern and followed it through air that smelled of rain. The walls were carved with questions in languages she could not read. Some were scratched deeply, as if written in anger; others were delicate. At the bottom, she entered a chamber where an old woman sat beside a pool of still water. Her hair floated as though underwater, and her eyes were the color of storms. "You came for your brother," the woman said. Mara gripped the compass. "Is he alive?" "That is one question," the woman replied, "but perhaps not the question you carried here." Mara looked into the pool. Its surface brightened, showing Tomas on the day he vanished. He stood aboard his boat beneath a cloudless sky, smiling as he untied a rope. Then a wall of fog surrounded him. Within it, a ship appeared, enormous and ancient, with torn sails and no crew. Tomas climbed aboard. The ship turned toward the horizon and vanished. "Where did it take him?" Mara asked. The old woman smiled sadly. "Is that your question?" Mara stopped. Her grandfather had said she would receive one true answer. Every word mattered. "What must I do to bring Tomas home alive?" The pool darkened. The old woman looked afraid. "You must give the sea something it values equally." "What does it value?" "A future freely offered." The chamber trembled, and dust fell from the ceiling. Far above, a roar rolled across the island. The sea was returning. "Choose quickly," said the woman. The pool showed Tomas standing on the ghost ship. He had not aged. Behind him stretched a night filled with unfamiliar stars. "Whose future?" Mara asked, though she knew. The woman said nothing. Mara thought of her cottage, the garden she planned to plant, places she dreamed of seeing, and the family she might have. She thought of Tomas teaching her to sail, carrying her home after she broke her ankle, and promising neither would face the world alone. Water crashed against the tower. Mara placed the compass in the pool. "Take mine," she said. The water rose around her hand, cold as winter. The old woman leaned forward. "A future cannot be returned once given." "Then make the trade." The pool swallowed the compass. Darkness filled the chamber, and Mara felt years rush through her like wind through an open door. She saw roads she would never walk, faces she would never meet, mornings that would never belong to her. Then everything stopped. The old woman was gone. In her place stood Tomas, soaked and trembling, wearing the blue coat he had worn seven years earlier. "Mara?" he whispered. She embraced him as the tower split with a thunderous crack. They ran up the staircase while water poured through the walls. Outside, the road was disappearing beneath racing waves. They sprinted toward shore, but the sea rose behind them, swallowing stone after stone. Tomas pulled Mara onto an abandoned fishing boat as the final stretch vanished. A wave lifted them and carried the boat toward the village. When Mara opened her eyes, dawn had arrived. The harbor was full again, and villagers crowded the pier. Tomas was home, unchanged, while Mara's hair had turned white. She felt no pain, yet knew the trade had been honored. She would live only until sunset. Tomas understood when he saw her face. He spent the day beside her on the cliff, telling her about the ghost ship, the endless night, and how her voice had guided him through darkness. As the sun lowered, Mara felt peaceful. "Was it worth it?" he asked, crying. She looked at the bright sea, then at the brother she had crossed its hidden floor to find. "Truth is rarely kind," she said, "but love can be." When the last light touched the water, the bells beneath the earth rang again, and Mara closed her eyes, smiling, while far below, a brass compass began pointing home.

On the morning the sea disappeared, Mara found a stone road rising from the seabed leading to an island that surfaces only when the moon forgets its name. Grandfather legends warned that reaching this place grants one true question and answer, though truth is rarely kind. Seven years prior, her brother Tomas had sailed into a clear afternoon and never returned. To find him, Mara packed bread, water, a lantern, and Tomas's brass compass, then walked the road past red coral, shattered anchors, statues covered in shells, a crown tangled in weeds, and a cannon pointed skyward. She swam through a valley of fish and whales while ignoring villagers' shouts and resisting the sea imitating what she loved by covering her ears when Tomas's voice pleaded from the water until it became laughter.

At sunset, Mara reached the island's green tower and descended a spiral staircase into a chamber where an old woman with storm-colored eyes sat beside a pool of still water. The walls were carved with unreadable questions. When asked if Tomas was alive, the pool revealed him boarding a ghost ship in fog. To bring him home alive, Mara had to offer a future freely offered. She gave her own future by placing the compass in the pool; the chamber trembled and dust fell as the woman warned that a future cannot be returned once given. The trade aged her instantly while restoring Tomas to his old self, and they fled the retreating sea on an abandoned fishing boat just before the road vanished beneath waves.

By morning, the harbor was full and villagers crowded the pier. Tomas was home and unchanged, while Mara's hair had turned white. She would live only until sunset. As Tomas spent the day recounting how her voice guided him through darkness, Mara accepted that while truth is rarely kind, love can be. When the last light touched the water, bells rang beneath the earth, and Mara closed her eyes smiling, while far below, a brass compass began pointing home.
